Reconstructing Theology

A Critical Assessment of the Theology of Clark Pinnock

Editors: Tony Gray and Chris Sinkinson

How do we understand God?

What assumptions do we have when we use the word 'god'?

If we presume that our contemporary world knows what we as Christian theologians mean, then we are probably wrong. People presume a certain picture of god, which may well be very far off from a Biblical picture of God.

For Christian communication in a post-modern world this of course a vital issue. However, the issue is an important one, even within the Christianity community. Amongst evangelical Christians, there is diversity even on how one would define a 'Biblical picture of God.' Does God have knowledge of the future (did God know for certain who was going to write this introduction)? Is God 'static', or does God change (can he weep and rejoice and forget and change his mind)? Does God work through non-Christian religions (does God save those who turn their hearts towards him in repentance, even if they have never heard the name of Christ)? These and other issues are now up for discussion.

Rather than being simply an attack on Clark Pinnock's theology, the contributors have engaged with Pinnock and created a dialogue with him.

This is a unique contribution to the massive theological debate surrounding the ideas of this hugely controversial figure.
